Summary of Analysis

The "Fear" emotion was consistently reflected in the model's outputs across most temperature settings.

At low temperatures (0.1–0.5), outputs were short and restrained—often vague, passive, and lacking expressiveness (e.g., "torture like the including").

From 0.7 to 1.0, the emotional tone became more distinct: words like creepy, dangerous, panic, nightmare, and afraid appeared, with more coherent expressions of internal fear or external threats.

Temperatures 1.3 to 1.6 pushed toward chaotic imagery—phrases like "traumatized," "slaves," "killers," and "drugs" surfaced—maintaining relevance but with rising surrealism.

By temperature 1.9+, the content often degenerated into fragmented, unsettling noise, with occasional gems of raw emotional confusion.

At temperature 5.0, coherence was almost completely lost—sentence structure broke down, though some fear-related content persisted.

Quality Analysis – Emotion: Grief

The generated texts reflect a range of grief-related emotions such as loss, sorrow, and emotional pain. At lower temperatures, outputs are short and simple but convey clear sadness. Higher temperatures lead to more complex and creative sentences, though sometimes incoherent. Phrases like "passing sheltered" and "sorry go truly wants be depressed" show authentic emotional depth.

However, repetition of words like "sorry" and "died" is frequent, and some sentences lack structure or clarity—especially at temperatures above 1.5.

Quality Analysis – Emotion: Relief

The generated texts reflect various aspects of relief — from subtle calmness to euphoric release.
At low temperatures (0.1–0.5), sentences are short, somewhat bland, but grammatically stable.
From 0.7 to 1.0, content becomes more expressive, with lines like "solved. now pure…" and "youtube you relieved…", capturing emotional tone well.
Above 1.3, creativity increases sharply, but coherence decreases. While some outputs are vibrant ("freedom do idiots so was great"), others are chaotic or nonsensical.

Overall, relief is preserved as a theme across most temperatures, with peaks in clarity and relevance between 0.7–1.0.

Quality Analysis – Emotion: Pride

The generated texts for pride reveal a steady progression in complexity and expression across temperature levels. At low temperatures (0.1–0.5), sentences are short and often lack context, though some hint at self-confidence ("gotta succeed for im", "celebrate am my"). From 0.7–1.0, we begin to see stronger emotional cues and clearer declarations of pride or achievement ("lottery some feeling a proudly is think", "friendship winning for save i side"). The most coherent and emotionally rich outputs appear around 0.8–1.3, with sentences like "knew i proud him, of experiences" or "really selfdeprecating process loves safe... future".

However, at higher temperatures (1.5+), coherence breaks down. Texts become chaotic, blending unrelated ideas and slang, often veering off-topic. There is still thematic relevance (e.g., "victorious", "accomplishment", "awards") but tangled in noisy or surreal phrasing.

Quality Analysis – Emotion: Embarrassment

In analyzing the emotion of Embarrassment, we observed a fascinating progression in the generated texts as temperature increased. At lower temperatures (0.1–0.5), outputs were short, hesitant, and often structurally incomplete — yet surprisingly aligned with emotional cues of discomfort or avoidance ("you was the time", "same oh, and impulsive"). As the temperature rose (0.7–0.9), the language became more socially contextualized, including mentions of awkwardness, social situations, and subtle cringe cues. From 1.0 and upward, the sentences became longer and more emotionally charged, sometimes explicitly embarrassing or exposing ("apologized joke", "masturbate over", "awkward mean down cringe"). In the highest ranges (1.5–3.0), coherence began to drop, but the emotional tone intensified, resembling a flood of chaotic, flustered thoughts — which mirrors real-life expressions of embarrassment.

The model showed a consistent emotional trajectory: from repressed silence to chaotic confession — exactly like authentic human embarrassment.
